

ABOUT THE AUSTRALIAN MARINERS' WELFARE SOCIETY

Following closure of the Sydney Sailors' Home in 1979, the Council turned its attention to providing facilities for retired merchant seafarers.

In December 1990, Mariners' Court, offering accommodation for 40 residents in comfortable, fully furnished serviced rooms with private facilities, was officially opened at Woolloomooloo. However, following a decline in occupancy, the facility was eventually sold in 1998.

This ushered in a new era for the organisation, which continues actively to serve seafarers today, but in ways quite different from those envisaged when the Sydney Sailors' Home was established.

In 2002, it reinvented itself as the Australian Mariners' Welfare Society. Today, under the leadership of its Chairman Captain Alan Tait, the Board of the Society oversees an active program of practical support for serving and retired seafarers.

For example, the organisation funds home unit accommodation in the northern suburbs of Sydney for a number of former seafarers, as well as offering scholarships to promising young Australians planning a career at sea to attend the Australian Maritime College at Launceston, Tasmania.

The Sydney Sailors' Home building, close by the Overseas Passenger Terminal in Circular Quay, is now a heritage-listed property maintained by the Sydney Harbour Foreshore Authority. Since being vacated by the Home, it has seen service as a marionette theatre and a tourist information office, and currently houses the Billich Art Gallery.

Membership of the Australian Mariners' Welfare Society is open to any person with an interest in maritime affairs. Further information about the Society is available from:

ABOUT THE BOOK

Australia's only links with the rest of the world in the mid-19th century depended entirely on communication by sea. Not surprisingly, therefore, the numerous charities and welfare groups concerned with the wellbeing of seafarers were generously supported by the community.

In 1859, a provisional committee was formed with the object of building a Sailors' Home in Sydney '... in which seamen, while on shore, could have comfortable accommodation, be brought under moral and religious influence and be encouraged in sober and thrifty habits'. In 1860, land in George Street North in the Rocks area of Sydney was earmarked for the Sydney Sailors' Home and construction work commenced in 1863. At that time, around 1,000 ships with crews totalling some 20,000 were coming to the port of Sydney each year.

The Sydney Sailors' Home opened its doors in February 1865. The adjoining Cadmans Cottage served from 1865 until 1926 as the living quarters for successive generations of Superintendents of the Home, who invariably were former shipmasters.

After operating continuously for 114 years, having survived the impact of two world wars, the great depression and occasional periods of low occupancy, the Home was closed in 1979 following compulsory resumption of the property by the Sydney Cove Redevelopment Authority.

The Council managing the Home, recognising generational changes then occurring in the shipping industry, along with a declining demand for accommodation of the kind offered by the Sailors' Home, identified other opportunities to continue serving seafarers.

Jan Bowen's entertaining story of the Sydney Sailors' Home, the people who drove its formation and the sometimes colourful characters who rested there will be a welcome addition to the maritime history of Sydney. The book also records the many challenges the Sailors' Home faced and, importantly, how it successfully responded to change over its lifetime. And it tells of how the Home recast its role, re-emerging in the early years of the 21st century as—among other things—a generous provider of ongoing financial assistance to organisations such as the Mission to Seafarers and the Stella Maris Clubs that open their doors to the hundreds of mariners whose work brings them to Australia's seaports every year.

Sensitively illustrated with historic and contemporary photographs, this book will be of interest to historians, librarians, seamen's charities, and indeed anyone interested in shipping, our early architecture and the stories of the seamen who have visited our shores.
